

A pen is a small object with a pointed end that contains a dark substance, which can be used to leave markings on surfaces. The markings made include shapes of all sizes, all different from one another.

From what I have witnessed, the pens were everywhere, containing different shades. Unique objects, as I noticed they were being used to communicate with others without the use of one's head.

My attempt at looking at the origins of these pens left me surprised at the different types there have been in history. As far back as I could see, the earliest type of pen was a rough block made from a wood like material. Even more confusing was the use of what seemed to be a piece of animal as a pen, almost as if they plucked a piece of it right from its skin, which was then placed into a see-through circular object which was filled with a black substance similar to that, that is left by the pens I saw used presently.
